

My Passionate Pursuit

So many stories to tell....

I could tell you the one about the red light...

Or perhaps the 1991 activists protest in Canberra...

Or maybe about my Dad... although I'm still trying to put that one together since by the time we wanted to know his story we didn't get the opportunity to ask. Life is too short.

But I'm passionate about story because it was one man's story that moved me from failure to success and one woman's story that moved me to faith, although neither would have seen that possibility at the time.

In truth however it was all part of one big story that started before I was born and will carry me through all eternity. God's story.

In her book, "Inspired" Rachel Held Evans writes...

"....It's so important to tell our children good stories. ... So I suspect that with the Bible, we will start with Adam and Eve, Jonah and the big fish, Jericho, the manger, and the cross. Sure, they will get the edited versions at first, just like we did, and of course they will pick up all sorts of strange interpretations from their friends, the culture, and theologically questionable cartoon adaptations; there's really no avoiding that. But I hope that by teaching them first to simply love these stories as they are, to relish their strange appeal, they will remember their magic when they rediscover them in their own way someday."

See you Sunday.
